Lloyd brooded over her death and frequently expressed the wish that he too, might die. His health gradually failed, and last March he was selzed with an attack of lumbago. He had almost recovered from that disease a month ago when he was stricken with inflammation of the bowels.

Although suffering excruciating agony he refused medical aid, and it was only by force that medicines were administered.

During last week he was able to be around his little shop. His mind seemed preoccupied, and he talked considerably of the lonely life of a childless widower, and berated the Providence that continued his life. Olsen, his faithful friend, exerted himself to cheef him up, but without avail.

Lloyd brought his cot from the rear room and placed it near the front doors. He also brought the pail used for soaking leather and placed it at the head of the cot, his intention being to catch the blood as it flowed from the wound he intended to inflict. Then he laid down without undressing.

At 2.10 Chappell was aroused by a muffied explosion. He sat up and, striking a light, saw Lloyd with his head hanging over the edge of the cot writhing in death agony. It lasted only a few seconds and then the form was still. The man had accomplished his own destruction just as he had planned.

The police of the Oak street station were notified, and at 6 o'clock this morning the body was removed to Moran's undertaking rooms, from where the funeral will take place to-morrow.
